LEIDY-EUGENE LEIDY, JR., died September 22, 1878, of yellow-fever, at Holly Springs. Two weeks previous to his death, although only ten years o 22d, at 9 o'clock a.m. Friends of the deccased are | age, he joined the Howards and worked for them fal hfully until he was taken down. Darkness, gloomler far than night, Brooded o'er our sunny land so bright, Darsness and sadness, terrible and drear. For the angel of death was reaping here. Then, countless fell in the gloomy strife. And noble hearts fell in the battle for life. Ah! well we remember the brave little youth, When Death held carnival in the south.

Taken from sickness, sadness, woe, Taken from all trouble below. Peacefully sleeping lies the bright boy, His father's pride, his mother's joy. Those lovely eyes; that willing hand; That worked so well for the Howard band: Those smiling lips, all latd to rest. His roung life ended, his mission blest.

Flowers that seemed too bright to bloom 'Mong so much of sorrow and gloom, Were seldom seen; but many came to grace Our little Gene's last resting-place. Physicians, nurses, all knew him well; With grieved, hushed voices would they tell of the brave young Howard gone above, To dwell 'midst joy, peace and love. Had he ever a fault, was willful and wild, 'Twas explated then by this heroic child; E'en the old grave-digger shed a tear, Thouga callous to such, o'er Eugene's bler.

Sleep on, little Gene; mother, weep not Happier, far happier, is your boy's lot. Weep not! let this comfort thee, Suffer little children to come unto me."

his dearest family ites, he fell in the unequal contest, asserting in his glorious death his right and claim to a lineage marked by heroic deeds, from the youthful captain of a sinking vessel, who died that the precious lives intrusted to his charge might live, to the greater in name and not less heroic sacrifice of an honored and distinguished father, who bears the burden of a nation's woes, proudly conscious as the approaches the sunset of life, that in the not distant future the principles for which he has so long and attentive wifered will be fully vindicated.
